TIPS & HELPFUL HINTS

PLANTING: Trees and shrubs are living and must be handled with care at all times. Never allow plant roots to dry out, whether bare root, balled with burlap or containerized. Keep out of sun and wind until immediately before planting. Dig a hole big enough to accommodate the roots and plant, about two inches deeper than the soil mark on the trunk. When refilling the hole, be sure to lightly pack soil in around roots, leaving a small basin shape for water-holding purposes.

PLANTING BARE ROOT: Bare root trees must be planted when the tree is dormant, which usually means early spring, or late fall. The grower protects the roots by wrapping them in damp moss and then covers the roots, ensuring they stay hydrated while being transported. But they can only remain so for a short time. If you must store before planting, place bare roots in a cool, dark place. If they encounter heat and sun, they'll emerge from dormancy, become stressed and may die without soil to protect and nourish their roots. To avoid risking their buds opening--a sign they're emerging from dormancy, plant your bare roots as soon as possible. Windy, hot, very sunny days can cause the roots to dry out too quickly or trigger the tree out of dormancy. Leave the bare root covered in the shade or a cool dampish basement while you dig the holes. Then removing one tree from its protection, set it in the hole. Gently pack the soil around it, forming a basin-like shape at the base of the tree. Continue until all are planted. Water as needed and enjoy your trees for many years.

TIPS & HELPFUL HINTS

PLANTING POTTED PLANTS: Containerized trees, shrubs and evergreens must be planted with roots intact, meaning you'll need to let your pots dry out a bit first before removing the pot. The entire root ball with dirt attached must emerge and go into the hole because within the soil are the tiny spider roots which the plant needs to get established in its new home. Transplanting is a shock to the plant so fertilizing should not be done immediately after planting.

PLANTING HEDGES: To ensure your hedge grows uniformly, take extra care with your planting. Use a stretched line as a guide for placement, leaving enough room so plant roots can spread out. Set plants deep enough so lower branches touch the soil.

WATERING: The success or failure of your trees and shrubs is in direct relation to the amount and frequency of water they receive. A depression at the base will allow water retention. Water newly planted stock two or three times a week during hot summer days, but there's no need to over-water. Do water well last thing in the fall.

WEED CONTROL: Lack of vigor in trees and shrubs may be due to competition from weeds. If planted in a lawn, create a soil area 2-3 feet around the tree that's free of weeds and grass. Landscape fabric and crushed rock are helpful in controlling weed growth.

FERTILIZER: We do not recommend fertilizing newly planted trees and shrubs as this may shock them after transplanting. Fertilize the following year with an all-purpose fertilizer.

SUNSCALD AND WINTER BROWNING OF EVERGREENS: This is caused by the bright sun reflecting off winter snow in February and March and is more likely to affect newly planted evergreens. Heavily water all evergreens in the late fall. For the first winter, loosely cover all cedar trees in burlap because roots may not be fully established.

WILDLIFE DAMAGE AND PROTECTION: Broken or damaged branches due to elk or deer should be pruned. If the branch is 1" diameter or larger, cover the fresh cut with pruning paste or spray to protect the branch from dying out.

Trees and shrubs add greatly to our environment, providing shade, food, beauty and privacy. Trees and shrubs also filter dust and pollution, take in carbon dioxide and release oxygen. Spruce trees planted on the north side of your house can cut heating costs. Deciduous trees on the east, west and south side offer summer shade, as well as light and warmth in winter. Many varieties of trees and shrubs produce fruit that remains well into winter and offers food for our wintering birds.

Potted stock is available from our nursery all season.

Packaged stock is only available until June 30th.
